- Silence, as a concept and as practice has been treated and interpreted variously with no exceptions of cultures, religious beliefs, and educational and professional background. Silence has found importance in religion and worship of God and religions. Silence in spirituality is a symbol of inner tranquillity. A silent mind is free from thoughts and thought patterns. It is an important step in spiritual development many religions indicate the importance of being quiet and still in mind and spirit for transformation and integral spiritual development. In Christianity, there is the silence of contemplative prayer. In Islam, there are the wisdom words of the Sufis who insist on the importance of the inner search for silence. Buddhism, allows the mind to become silent and implies it for spiritual enlightenment. In Hinduism, with the teachings of Vedanta and the many paths of yoga, the Gurus insist on the importance of silence, or Mauna, for inner growth. Perkey Avot, the Jewish Sage guide for living, states that, in some traditions of Quakerism, communal silence is the usual context of worship meetings, inpatient expectancy for the divine to speak in the heart and mind. In psychological studies, in creativity, in training, etc. sometimes silence is a therapy and sometimes it is ruinous. It is also considered by communication and leadership experts as a potent tool in interpersonal communication or negotiation. Silence has a relation with the situation and the individual.
