Literature and HR Management, prima facie seem poles apart in study and practice. Literature is about creativity, fiction, emotions, poetry, language, description, narration, etc. and HR Management is about recruitment, retention, performance, motivation, change management, policies and laws, etc. They do not seem to be in proximity from any angle. Let's look at it differently: literature is for the people and of the people, it talks about human life, psychology, and emotions. The raw material is ultimately human being and so is the end user. Human Resource Management is also about people i.e. Humans, dealing with them, helping them, motivating them, taking care of their emotions, respecting their positives trying to improve their negatives, etc. Human Resources Management and Literature, both as disciplines of study, have a lot of proximity in terms of philosophy, dealing with humans and human predicament, character and personality, product quality that can stand the test of time, the universality of certain principles, etc. management and Literature both deal with case [story] study form in education as well as tackling a situation. HR Management adopts certain things like stories, quotes, language skills, narration and description techniques in training, performance management, branding, etc. to be more effective and Literature can take corporate life and management challenges as raw material for its creation. Human psychology and situation are involved in both fields and that makes the study and practice more interesting and challenging. Simultaneously, both Management and Literature have to consider the contemporary norms, and regional flavours and be dynamic and adaptable to avoid redundancy. It is also interesting that both challenge the existing norms and practices and enable the human intellect to develop and hone the mind and thought process. Management as well as Literature facilitate the education and functioning of other fields like law and legal machinery, education, philosophy, and even technology to some extent. Moreover, both fields focus on the human predicament, problem, and solution as well as throw light on the bigger picture of preventive measures be it at an individual level, organizational level, or societal level.
